

the Harrold

Week of November 13-18, 2017

Interesting Facts for the Week

Orcas are very social and live in groups called pods, which usually have up to 40 members. There are two different kinds of pods: A resident pod is less aggressive and tends to prefer fish. Transient pods act much like wolf packs and are much more aggressive. They hunt marine mammals by working together.

Orcas are apex predators, at the top of the food chain. No other animals (except for humans) hunt orcas. Killer whales feed on sea birds, squid, octopuses, sea turtles, sharks, rays and fish. They also eat most marine mammals, such as seals and dugongs. The only exceptions are river dolphins and manatees, according to the IUCN (International Union for Conservation of Nature). Killer whales have also been reported to eat moose. Recently, Orcas have been observed attacking and killing Great White Sharks by removing their livers (with surgical accuracy) and eating the livers but leaving the rest of the shark's body.
